Zine d'art postal, d'art posté et d'art en général...

Rencontre avec Peter Dowker (Flipflop Mailart)

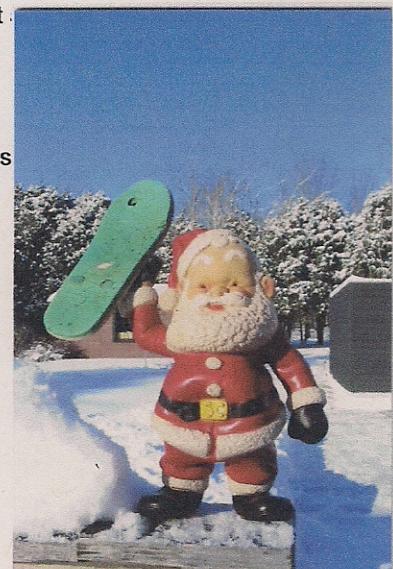

Après plusieurs essais, le 22 juillet dernier j'ai finalement rencontré Peter après s'être donnés rendez-vous pour dîner chez-lui. J'ai été chaleureusement accueilli par Peter et sa conjointe Josée. Nous avons beaucoup discuté art postal sur des thèmes aussi variés que; les thèmes (!) en art postal, nos correspondants réguliers et les techniques entre autres. J'ai rapidement constaté que nous avons beaucoup de points en communs. Pour en énumérer quelques uns, que nous sommes tous deux en retard dans nos envois d'art postal et que nous sommes des fumeurs invétérés. Le sujet des thèmes est probablement celui qui a soulevé le plus de commentaires et de questionnement. Je doit ici admettre qu'il y a des thèmes qui portent rapidement à couper l'inspiration. Ou encore, quatre ou cinq thèmes dans le même thème. En bref, c'est n'importe quoi! Peter m'a fait visiter son atelier. Et atelier, ce n'est peu dire... Le rêve du mailartiste; de l'espace, de la lumière, du désordre et la pièce est occupée par Peter seulement. Je ne peux malheureusement me payer ce luxe pour l'instant mais je planifie...

Je ne pouvais quitter sans demander à Peter d'où venait la passion pour les flip flop. Il m'a raconté qu'il passait beaucoup de temps l'hiver en vacances à la République Dominicaine. Lorsqu'il marchait sur la plage, un objet se démarquait toujours des autres sur la plage, et ce, régulièrement; les flip flop. Ces sandales qui sont omniprésentes sur la planète sont parfois perdues, échappées ou tout simplement jetées à la mer. Puisqu'elles flottent, elles peuvent parcourir de grandes distances d'où leur apparences usées par l'effet du sable, de la mer et du soleil. Il s'est fait des œuvres d'arts. Les tableaux de Peter où il a incorporé des flip flop sont tout à fait magnifiques; couleurs, textures et formes rendent ses tableaux presque vivants. Je dirai même une certaine figuration anthropologique des flip flop. On se pose des questions sur les flip flop ainsi utilisées dans les tableaux de Peter: Qui était son propriétaire? Comment a-t-il pu s'en départir? Perdue? Combien de temps et de kilomètres a-t-elle parcourue avant de s'échouer sur une plage? D'ailleurs, pourquoi cette plage en particulier plutôt qu'une autre? Autant de questions et de réflexions qui nous amène à se poser.

Somme toute, une rencontre fort agréable et amicale. Nous nous sommes entendus pour répéter l'expérience. Encore une fois Peter et Josée, merci beaucoup pour votre aimable hospitalité.

ALL THAT JAZZ !!! & STILL NO FREEDOM ???

will be the new FRIOUR project. Personally I don't know any music that embodies more the thirst for freedom than jazz music. Jazz includes the notions of improvisations and excitement. It liberated the soul and hearts of many, opened new roads and ways of playing music and listening to music. In recent years I've become a huge jazz fan and became even friends with a few Belgian jazz musicians, attending concerts and festivals as much as I could.

Despite all that jazz there is little room for improvisation in business life, personal life and society as a whole. Do people need a worldwide crisis to be controlled?

Blow all fear away and send your contributions for the next Friour Review issue.

conscience de quelque chose », de même notre conscience reconnaît l'existence d'autres consciences dans un sentiment originé de « coexistence ». La croyance en l'existence d'autrui est attitude irréfléchie mais fondamentale de la personne, une caractéristique primitive de notre insertion dans le monde et d'humanité.

C'est ainsi que, selon Hegel ou Sartre, l'existence d'autrui se révèle immédiatement dans l'expérience du conflit. Le fait premier n'est pas la solitude du « cogito », mais le conflit des consciences. Dire « je » c'est attendre qu'autrui me reconnaisse comme conscience autonome. lorsque le guerrier vainqueur sauve la vie à son adversaire, il en fait un esclave (servus, ce qui a été conservé) qui le reconnaîtra pour maître. Ainsi la conscience du vainqueur sera celle qu'elle est, que parce qu'elle connaît son reflet dans une autre conscience. Ces thèmes retrouvent dans la théorie saintienne du regard. Le regard est une expérience immédiate de la communication. Etre vu c'est sentir menacé par autrui, vulnérable : si à mon tour je regarde l'autre, je mesure ma puissance. Mais on voit que la communication échoue dans et par son effort même pour se réaliser puisque le moi ne reconnaît l'autre que pour l'asservir, pour le réduire au rôle de témoin et de miroir, ce qui aboutit à la mort.

THE ZEIT GIST

Japan zines: Never mind the bloggers

Gianni Simone offers an insider's view of the underground DIY publishing scene

The World's Window on Japan
The Japan Times
ONLINE

By GIANNI SIMONE

Koenji is a nice, quiet place in the suburbs, but venturing along its Kitanaka Street one weekend last March, you could not have missed the commotion coming out of Shirouto no Ran No. 12. Crammed inside this small rental space, dozens of people were poring over, discussing and exchanging piles upon piles of booklets bursting with eye-catching imagery and color. The get-together was the biggest yet for Japanese "zinedom": the 4th Tokyo Zinester Gathering, a two-day event devoted to making, trading and selling zines.

Confused? If so, that's probably because zinedom is a mostly underground world that exists below the radar of the mainstream media. Nowadays everybody is familiar with blogs, but relatively few people know that a long time before the Internet, there was a whole community of independent publishers who more or less did the same thing bloggers do today, but on paper. Even today, in the age of the blogosphere, zine-making remains a global phenomenon with thousands of practitioners. Try a simple online search for "zines" and you'll end up with millions of hits.

Born around the mid-1800s, when the first small home-printing machines allowed people to produce their own journals on the cheap, zines are unadulterated, unfiltered purveyors of creative ideas and honest opinions. Even today, most zines are cheap, independently published booklets, generally created by a single person, either in the classic cut-and-glue style typical of zinedom's DIY philosophy, or with the help of a computer. The zine-maker is responsible for the whole production process, from providing all the content to actually photocopying, folding, stapling and distributing each copy.

While the West abounds in zines, Japan is relatively underrepresented. In this country there are comparatively few publications, and even those few are quite hard to track down.

On the other hand, one phenomenon unique to Japan is the huge dojinshi movement. Dojinshi are underground self-published comics that, at least in spirit, are close to the zine ethic. Nowadays they typically take characters from established comics and famous novels and movies and place them in new stories, alternative couplings or parallel worlds. Some of them sell thousands of copies. They clearly infringe copyright laws, but publishers seldom sue because they play an important role in creating a faithful fan base.

The Japan Times recently talked with some of the main players in the local zine scene, both Japanese and foreign.

Keisuke Narita (or Kei-san, as everybody calls him), one of the organizers of the Zine Gathering, is a very mellow guy in his early 30s whom you can find most days at Irregular Rhythm Asylum (IRA), a tiny radical "info-shop" in Shinjuku. Though hardly charismatic at first sight, he has almost single-handedly managed to attract some of the best minds in the Japanese angura (underground) scene to his events, and has been instrumental in helping local DIY culture to flourish.

"About 20 years ago I was into punk. I couldn't play any instruments but I wanted to express myself in some way because there were some things I couldn't accept like war, politics and mainstream media," explains Narita. "So I created my first zine, Expansion of Life, that I still make even though it's currently on hiatus. This way I met many interesting people."

"The next step was to start an online store — a so-called 'distro' — through which we could trade and distribute all those people's zines and music," he recalls.

"Then a friend of mine offered me to share a space, so I opened IRA in 2004. The best thing in all this is that IRA has become a pole of attraction for many people in the activist/DIY scene, and we are still growing. We are also reaching out to zinesters and other creative types abroad."

Kei-san doesn't make a living through zines. He's a Web designer, but his job allows him enough free time to pursue his passions.

"For several years we were in the red. Recently we have reached a point in which the stuff we sell through the shop and distro more or less covers our expenses. But I don't care about money. What I want to support is people's autonomy and creativity, not the market, and I feel the alternative scene is finally growing in Japan too."

If you manage to navigate the maze of back streets and track down the cramped IRA headquarters, you will find CDs (mostly punk), clothes, badges, new and old books (e.g., anarchist literature) and, of course, zines. Most are in Japanese, but there are plenty in English as well.

"But as I said," Kei-san is eager to add, "IRA is first and foremost a meeting point. You can come here, relax on the sofa, have a nice cup of coffee while chatting with other interesting people, and spend as much time as you want. We also organize events, concerts and movie viewings, both here and in other venues. On Thursdays, for instance, we have a clothes-making circle — I actually graduated from a fashion college."

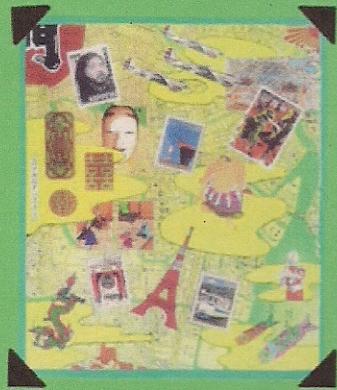

If you find IRA's Japanese Web site too intimidating, then Wasabi Distro is the place to go. New Yorker Andrea Hope, 36, is the brave expat who a few years ago started this online catalog in order to showcase (mostly, but not only) English zines made in Japan, and sell foreign stuff cheaply to the zine-starved expat community.

"My experience with zines came through indie comics and punk music," says Hope. "When I first came to Japan, I became friends with Mia Ellis and wrote articles for her zine Pearshaped. She got me into perzines — short for personal zines; zines that focus on their author's personal life — and introduced me to the awesome Exile Osaka, done by Matt Exile, who lives in Kansai."
