DES LAMPES DE BUREAU GÉANTES ENVAHISSENT QUÉBEC

Extrait de CyberPresse du 1^{er} juillet 2014. Article de GUILLAUME PIEDBOEUF (Le Soleil)

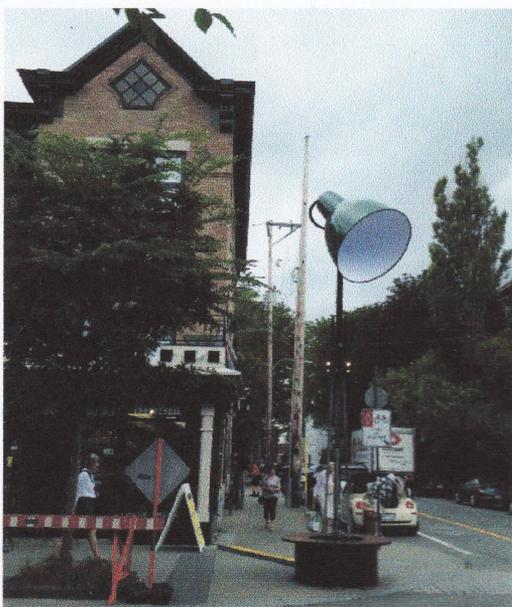

Des lampes de bureau format géant ont fait leur apparition au parc de l'Esplanade et sur la rue Cartier. Les Lampounettes, comme les a baptisées leur créateur français François Fouilhé, débarquent pour la première fois en Amérique du Nord à l'invitation du Festival d'été de Québec (FEQ).

Assemblés pour la première fois en France en 2012 par TILT, un collectif spécialisé en mobilier urbain, ces luminaires de plus de six mètres voyagent depuis plus de deux ans de festival en festival, un peu partout à travers le monde. Après Singapour en 2012 et Dubaï en 2013, François Fouilhé se dit ravi de pouvoir montrer sa création aux gens de Québec à l'occasion du volet des arts de la rue du FEQ. Des 12 Lampounettes que possède TILT, six sont exposées à Québec, divisées également entre le parc de l'Esplanade et la rue Cartier.

M. Fouilhé est convaincu que ses lampes attireront l'attention des passants. «On a tous eu une lampe comme ça sur notre bureau quand on était petit», explique-t-il au sujet de la classique lampe d'architecte, «là, elle est 10 fois plus grande et on peut s'asseoir dessus!» Il conseille à la population de Québec de venir les admirer le soir, alors que les jeux de lumière multicolores sont mis en valeur. Bien qu'elles aient toutes la même structure, chaque Lampounette se distingue par la position dans laquelle elle est placée.

À Québec jusqu'à la fin du Festival d'été le 13 juillet, François Fouilhé et son équipe se transporteront ensuite sur la rue Sainte Catherine à Montréal à l'occasion du festival Juste pour rire.

Les Lampounettes, créées par le français François Fouilhé, voyagent depuis deux ans à travers le monde. C'est la première fois qu'elles débarquent en Amérique du Nord, à l'occasion du Festival d'été de Québec.

DÉCÈS DE ON KAWARA (1933-2014)

On Kawara, l'artiste conceptuel japonais et qui a fait de New York sa résidence au cours des dernières cinquante années est décédé le 10 juillet. Il était âgé de 81 ans. Un représentant de la galerie David Zwirner en a fait l'annonce officielle.

Kawara a investigué la nature de temps et a beaucoup joué avec l'idée de l'identité face à la mort. Il refusait toutes les demandes d'entrevues et déclinait que sa photo soit prise.

On Kawara, canvases from the "Today Series" (1966 - present)

Pour sa série artistique "Today" qu'il a commencé en 1966 et qu'il a continué tout au long de sa carrière, il a peint avec grand soin les dates du jour sur une toile. Il travaillait sans gabarits et utilisait le style de présentation de date similaire à celui du pays où il se trouvait. Ses travaux étaient généralement présentés avec des entêtes de journaux locaux de la même journée.

Une autre série artistique très connue est "I Am Still Alive," qui consiste à des télégrammes envoyés à des amis ou connaissances qui annonçait qu'il était toujours en vie.

Title: THE JOURNEY- METAPHOR OF LIFE

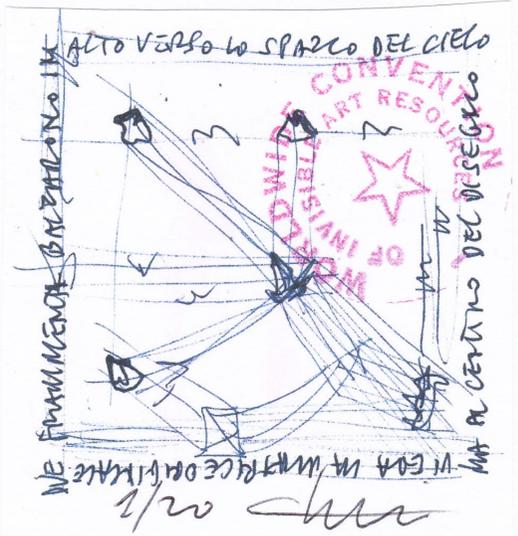

Metaphor is ample space in literature and art and also in the last Poetic texts. Dante's Divine Comedy, with his debut, "In the middle of the journey of our life" preparing to narrate a journey, not a trip to any but an inner journey made by a man and as an example to all of us through allegories, shows how the word 'life' is often associated with the word 'journey', because by reflecting 'travel' and 'life' are a bit 'the same thing: the moment we are born until we die, each of us makes changes , both physical and mental, let's call them "TRAVEL" changes that make our way of being. In any physical or mental journey we are confronted with others and with ourselves, with our capabilities, this leads to an inner change to a change in our life's journey ...

PLEASE MISTER POSTMAN

AT THE END OF LAST YEAR, CANADA POST ANNOUNCED IT WAS RAISING PRICES AND ENDING HOME DELIVERY FOR CITY DWELLERS. KELLY BOUTSALIS LOOKS AT WHAT THIS REALLY MEANS FOR MAIL-LOVING ARTISTS.

Illustration by [unreadable]

Over the Christmas holidays, when most Canadians were either sending out or anticipating the arrival of mail, the news was released that Canada Post would be ending door-to-door delivery service across the country. Home delivery would be phased out and replaced by community mailboxes.

A five-point plan briefly outlined the changes — including a rise in stamp prices and a reduction in employees — that would help stop a projected financial loss of $1 billion by 2020, caused by a decline in letter mail and an increase in internet usage. For the most part, however, the news came with few details, and everyone from mail carriers to the average citizen began to wonder what that meant for their mail.

Independent artists have used the mail and Canada Post for decades to extend the reach of their art, poetry and zines. Even more, they use it to physically connect with their audience.

Mail delivery crosses paths with art most frequently through the longstanding networks and traditions of mail art: people sending handmade collages, decorative postcards or any kind of art creation that can be mailed to their network of veritable strangers. The movement is typically traced back to 1955, the time of American collage artist Ray Johnson and the New York Correspondence School. But artists outside of mail art networks have long relied on the postal service to not only send out their music, zines or crafts to willing consumers, but to deliver an exciting antidote to the endlessness of online content.

For BC-based mail artist Ed Varney, who has been sending out mail art since 1970 — when sending out letters cost five cents — these changes will greatly affect the way he distributes his art. “I am slowing down in my mailing activity, restricting myself to mainly [sending to] old friends and artists whose work I am interested in.”

This is vastly different from the large network Varney has been sending mail art to for the last 40 years, which at its peak included a mailing list of about 250 to 300 artists.

It’s no surprise that he’s appreciative of a mail system that shuttled his work to thousands of people.

“I think that mail art was a strategy that preceded and anticipated the internet and the internet has taken over some of the functions of communication that mail art used to employ,” says Varney in, ironically, an email. “But the exchange of real objects and art through the postal system still has incredible vitality — as a medium becomes obsolete, it becomes more precious. People still love to get mail — that is, real mail, personal communication, beautiful handmade objects, and all that implies.”

While Varney represents the individual mail art movement, Kristen McCrea represents a collection of artists whose works have travelled across the country via Canada Post since 2008 when she founded Papirmasse, a magazine and art subscription rolled into one.

Every month, subscribers of Papirmasse receive a different piece of art in the mail, which can vary in size and format. In their mailboxes, recipients can find an art print on one side and writing on another, and the packages have included postcards, 18 x 20 inch posters, and even small books.

Started in Montreal and now printed in Toronto, Papirmasse has roughly 1,400 subscribers, about half of whom reside in Canada.

Like many artists and small publishers who rely on federal mail service, McCrea has a lot of questions about Canada Post’s proposed changes.

“As someone who has devoted the last many years of my life to building a business that sends art through the mail, it was quite devastating,” says McCrea about discovering Canada Post’s plans. “Also because the news came with very little information as to how it would be practically implemented, so it raised a lot more questions than it was answering, unfortunately.”

The size of the mailboxes is one of her main concerns.

“People are only going to have these tiny boxes so their print is going to get mashed up when it gets delivered to them and we might lose a lot of our Canadian subscribers,” she projects.

McCrea had hoped Papirmasse could be a voice for Canadian contributors, since American artists tend to be more prominent even in our country’s own publications and galleries.

“The saddest thing for me is that it makes me think maybe I should focus more on Americans in the future, which isn’t an attitude that I want to have because a core part of our mandate [is] to keep it around 80% Canadian,” says McCrea, “I really think there’s an overwhelming amount of talent in this country and its underrepresented.”

When Canada Post revealed its five-year-plan last December, McCrea says she heard from many of the 80 artists that Papirmasse has published so far, but most prominently she heard from other small press publishers who were wondering how community mailboxes and an increase in postage stamps would impact them.

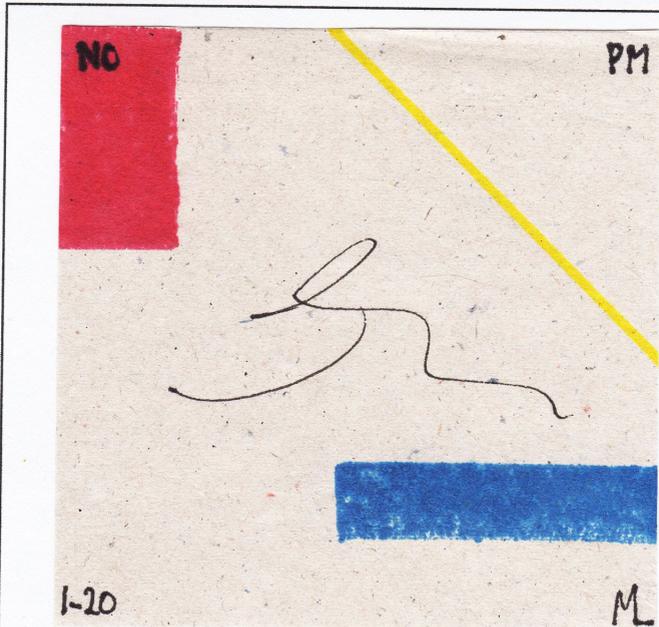

Evan Munday, the outgoing head publicist of Toronto-based Coach House Books, was also in the dark about how the postal changes would affect his company.

Coach House, which uses Canada Post for review copy mailouts and online orders, sends out anywhere between 60 to 150 pieces of mail a month, not including letter mail.
